Agree or disagree

Essays 1: 教育类 / 科技与社会类 (混合话题)

Some people argue that because the Internet makes it so easy for children to access facts, schools should not focus on teaching facts. Instead, they should focus on developing children's skills and potential, and their relationships with other people.

To what extent do you agree or disagree with this opinion?

As information is now so accessible online, it can be argued that schools should move away from fact-based teaching and towards work on skills and relationship building. I completely agree with this idea.

There are two main reasons why I believe that school teachers should no longer focus on presenting factual information to their students. Firstly, there is simply no need for teachers to create lessons that are already available in multimedia format on the Internet. YouTube, for example, contains videos that cover the full range of school subjects and lesson topics. Secondly, young people are so adept at using websites and search engines that they can be trusted to do their own online fact-finding. In my opinion, this research could be done as homework, which would remove the need for the teaching of facts in the classroom.

A shift away from the traditional style of teaching would allow schools to build their students' practical and social skills. Useful practical skills might include online research, presentations, website design, and even computer programming. Competence in these areas is in high demand in today's job market. With regard to social or relationship skills, a modern approach to education would put more emphasis on group projects that require teamwork, negotiation and the delegation of tasks. This way of teaching could develop students' emotional intelligence and leadership qualities, and help all children, regardless of academic ability, to reach their potential.

In conclusion, I believe that classroom teaching should prioritise skills and interpersonal relationships, while factual knowledge can be studied at home via the Internet.

Essays 2: 文化与休闲类

Some people say that music is a good way of bringing people of different cultures and ages together.

To what extent do you agree or disagree with this opinion?

It is often said that music has the power to unite and connect people, regardless of their cultural backgrounds or ages. I completely agree with this view, and will give my reasons below.

Music can certainly reach across cultural and national boundaries and bring people together. Perhaps the best example of this would be the Live Aid concerts that took place back in the 1980s, and which were broadcast to a global audience. Two live events were held simultaneously in the UK and the US, and the objective was to raise funds for famine relief in Ethiopia. The concerts were a huge success, both in terms of the number of people around the world who watched them and their impact on international public awareness of the famine. They demonstrated, I believe, that music truly is the planet's global language.

Just as it transcends cultures, music also has the ability to connect people from different generations. Regardless of age, we can all enjoy a memorable melody, a strong rhythm or a beautiful singing voice, and the best songs seem to have the same magical effect on all of us. This would explain why televised music competitions, such as 'The X Factor' or 'The Voice', are such popular prime-time shows. These programmes attract incredibly broad audiences because singing and popular songs appeal to children, parents and grandparents alike. I would argue that no other form of entertainment can bring families together in this way.

In conclusion, I believe that music is unique in its capacity to create shared experiences between people, irrespective of culture and age.

Essays 3: 职场与社会类

First impressions are important. Some people think that doing well in interviews is the key to securing a good job.
To what extent do you agree or disagree?

Most people try to make a good impression when they meet others, especially in work situations. While I accept that it is important to come across well in a job interview, I disagree with the idea that interview performance is the decisive factor in the recruitment process.

There are two main reasons why candidates seek to make a good first impression in job interviews. Firstly, interviews are a great opportunity for applicants to demonstrate competence to a potential employer. They can do this by answering questions well and by describing relevant work experience. Secondly, interviewees realise that it is important to come across well on a personal level, in order to build rapport with the interviewer and show that they can become part of his or her team. This is why positive body language, including eye contact, smiling and a firm handshake, is essential in the interview situation.

However, I would argue that qualifications and experience are more important than interview performance. Qualifications are an essential prerequisite for employment because they show whether or not the candidate has the relevant knowledge for the position. They can also tell the interviewer something about the applicant's character, in the sense that good grades are usually achieved through persistent focus and hard work. Similarly, a person's previous experience tells the employer how prepared he or she is to start work. For example, a teacher who has taught in schools for several years is unlikely to need the classroom management training that a recent graduate may require.

In conclusion, I believe that qualifications and experience are the keys to securing a job, although good first impressions at the interview stage can also help.

Essays 4: 社会与家庭类

Caring for children is probably the most important job in any society. Because of this, all mothers and fathers should be required to take a course that prepares them to be good parents.

To what extent do you agree or disagree with this view?

It is true that parents shoulder a huge responsibility and that raising children is by no means an easy task. However, I completely disagree with the idea that we should therefore force all mothers and fathers to attend parenting courses.

In my opinion, the idea that all future parents should take a parenthood preparation course is completely impractical. Many prospective parents have jobs and busy schedules, and they may not be willing or able to attend regular parenting classes. This raises the question of whether those who missed the classes, or perhaps refused to attend, would be punished. I believe that it would be wrong to do this, and it would therefore be impossible to enforce the idea of compulsory training for parents. Besides, even if parents could be forced to attend, I doubt that people would agree on what good parenting entails, and so it would be difficult to create a parenting course to suit everyone.

As well as being impractical, I would argue that training courses for parents are unnecessary. Mothers and fathers have been raising children without any formal help or official interference for thousands of years. Parenting skills are learnt from family members, friends, neighbours and the surrounding culture. Perhaps more importantly, adults learn to be good parents by instinct, by trial and error, and by getting to know their own children; for example, a good parent will try different strategies when faced with a badly-behaved child, and will gradually develop an understanding of what works to correct the behaviour. None of this requires the intervention of a taught course.

In conclusion, while compulsory parenting lessons might seem like a good idea, I believe that such a scheme would be unworkable and largely pointless.

Essays 5: 政府政策与健康类

Many manufactured food and drink products contain high levels of sugar, which causes many health problems. Sugary products should be made more expensive to encourage people to consume less sugar.

Do you agree or disagree?

It is true that the excess sugar in processed foods and beverages contributes to a range of illnesses and health issues. However, I completely disagree with the idea that raising the price of sugary products is the best way to address this problem.

In my opinion, there is absolutely no need to make certain products more expensive in order to highlight their sugar content. People these days are well aware that soft drinks, such as cola, and sweet foods, like cakes and biscuits, are high in sugar. Most of us also know that sugar is added to cooking sauces and takeaway meals to improve the taste, and we understand that such foods are less healthy than home-cooked meals. The average person sees sugary products as treats for special occasions, and is able to consume them in moderation. Therefore, I believe that we should trust adults to make their own health decisions, rather than trying to control their eating habits through government measures.

I also believe that the proposed price increase would be unfair. I predict that this idea would have unintended consequences, especially for less wealthy members of society. For example, poorer parents may not be able to afford cakes, sweets and fizzy drinks for their children's birthday parties. By contrast, wealthy people would not even notice the price change, and would continue to buy whatever foods and drinks they liked. So, instead of encouraging positive eating habits, an increase in the price of sugary products could end up being a discriminatory measure that turns simple treats into luxuries.

In conclusion, I consider a price rise for products containing high levels of sugar to be an unnecessary and unfair proposal.

Essays 6: 教育与艺术类

Some educationalists say that every child should be taught how to play a musical instrument. To what extent do you agree or disagree?

Many people believe that all children should be given the opportunity to learn a musical instrument. I completely agree with this idea, for a variety of reasons.

The ability to play music brings many benefits that all children should experience. The main benefit, in my opinion, is the joy that comes from creating musical sounds, melodies, rhythms and songs on an instrument. Such enjoyment can be even more intense when people play music together in a band, or perhaps even in a full orchestra. A second key reason to learn a musical instrument is that habitual practice requires discipline and patience, both of which are useful life skills. Daily piano practice, for example, could include repetition of musical phrases and gradual mastery of a full song or piece of music.

It would be easy to make learning an instrument compulsory in schools, in the same way that maths and science are. I believe that this should be done at primary school age, when children are most receptive to learning new skills. With a relatively small amount of funding, governments could help schools to buy a musical instrument for every child. For example, they could invest in a set of electronic keyboards, some inexpensive guitars, and perhaps some woodwind and percussion instruments. children could then choose an instrument and receive a certain amount of scheduled tuition each week.

In conclusion, I would like all children to enjoy being able to play a musical instrument, and I believe that this is an achievable goal for schools to have.

Essays 7: 语言、文化与移民类

Living in a country where you have to speak a foreign language can cause serious social problems, as well as practical problems.

To what extent do you agree or disagree with this statement?

Life in a country where a different language is spoken can be challenging. I agree with the idea that people who put themselves in this situation should prepare for significant social and practical problems.

The language barrier and differences in behaviour are the main social problems for anyone living in a foreign-language environment. Most migrants are not proficient in the new language, which makes meeting local people and making friends difficult. These challenges can have a negative effect on an individual's confidence, and in some cases lead to feelings of loneliness, isolation or alienation. Another potential social problem is that new arrivals may offend locals inadvertently if they are unaware of cultural expectations, norms, differences regarding politeness. In Britain, for example, it is easy speakers to sound rude if they forget to say 'please' and 'thank you'.

Two practical problems for non-native speakers are finding accommodation and securing work. When searching for a place to live, migrants face language difficulties, which range from speaking to estate agents to understanding contracts. They are at a particular disadvantage when it comes to dealing with disputes with landlords, who may exploit _them by charging more. With regard to finding work, employers are often reluctant to hire staff who are not fluent, proficient in the local language. They may worry that overseas workers will struggle to understand phone conversations, which could lead to miscommunication with customers.

In conclusion, living in a foreign-language culture is undoubtedly difficult, both socially and for practical reasons.

Essays 8: 政府财政与医疗职业类

Some people believe that nurses should not have to pay for their nursing degrees. To what extent do you agree or disagree?

It is sometimes argued that student nurses should be exempt from the normal tuition fees that universities charge. I completely agree with this view, for the reasons described below.

Nurses provide a vital service and they are among the most important workers in any society. In hospitals, nurses carry out a huge range of procedures and tasks, such as taking blood samples, running diagnostic tests, administering drugs, liaising with patients' families, and providing general care and comfort to people who are ill. Every member of society will require one or more of these services at some point in their lives. Moreover, without nursing staff, hospitals would cease to function, healthcare systems would collapse, and people would die unnecessarily. I would argue, therefore, that the nursing profession is indispensable, and that exempting nurses from course fees is a good way to recognise their value.

Unfortunately, nurses are also relatively poorly paid, and an exemption from course fees might help to attract more people to this vocation. In the UK, an average nurse earns around half of what a typical doctor receives. This seems unfair when we consider the long hours that nursing staff work, as well as the stressful nature of their jobs. Many would-be nurses may choose other professions rather than incur large student debts that will be difficult to repay. Free training would at least remove this obstacle and make a career in nursing more desirable.

In conclusion, I believe that free tuition is a good way to show the value that we place on nurses, and to incentivise more people to enter the nursing profession.

Essays 9: 现代媒体与大众传播类

News stories on TV and in newspapers are very often accompanied by pictures. Some people say that these pictures are more effective than words. To what extent do you agree or disagree with this opinion?

Some people believe that images are better than words for communicating news stories. I would only partly agree with this, because I believe that words can be more powerful in certain situations.

On the one hand, I agree that pictures are often more impactful than written text in the context of a news article or broadcast. In some cases, a single image can capture the essence of an event and provoke an emotional response much more effectively than a description would. For example, I remember being immediately shocked when I saw footage of the tsunami that hit Japan in 2011. Images can also help to convey information that is difficult to put into words, such as the scale of a disaster or the enormity of a protest. A recent example of this was the devastation caused by the Turkey-Syria earthquake, which would have been impossible to describe using words alone.

However, there are also times when a phrase or written description is more effective than a picture. Newspapers regularly lead with dramatic or witty headlines, rather than a photograph, and readers may remember these long after an image is forgotten. For example, I still associate the phrase "Yes, we can" with Barack Obama's 2008 election campaign, and several news outlets used that slogan to great effect in their headlines. Longer passages of text can also be extremely powerful, especially when a particular news story is complex. This was the case in early 2020, when we all wanted to learn as much as possible about the new coronavirus, and pictures alone could not communicate all the details of what was happening.

In conclusion, while news pictures can grab our attention and convey ideas very quickly, words can sometimes be more memorable and informative.

Essays 10: 教育与现代科技类

As computers are being used more and more in education, there will soon be no role for the teacher in the classroom.

To what extent do you agree or disagree?

It is true that computers have become an essential tool for teachers and students in all areas of education. However, while computers are extremely useful, I do not agree with the idea that they could soon replace teachers completely.

On the one hand, the use of information technology (IT) should certainly be an integral part of every school curriculum. Schools must teach a full range of IT skills, from online research to report writing, in order to prepare their students for the working world. At the same time, technology is a powerful tool to engage students. The use of websites or online videos can make lessons much more interesting, and many students are more motivated to do homework using online resources. Computers also make it easier for students to study at their own pace.

However, all of the activities described above require some input from a human teacher. School pupils need to be guided by a real person who can structure their learning programmes and support their use of IT. A computer can never really get to know a student and will not be able to respond to problems, answer questions or give precise feedback. Consequently, without the presence of a human teacher, students may become confused and unmotivated. This is exactly what happened during the 2020 pandemic when both teachers and students realised that video lessons were a poor substitute for the classroom experience.

In conclusion, computers can help in the classroom, but they will never supplant human teachers.

Essays 11: 犯罪与社会

Some people who have been in prison become good citizens later, and it is often argued that these are the best people to talk to teenagers about the dangers of committing a crime.

To what extent do you agree or disagree?

It is true that ex-prisoners can become normal, productive members of society. I completely agree with the idea that allowing such people to speak to teenagers about their experiences is the best way to discourage them from breaking the law.

In my opinion, teenagers are more likely to accept advice from someone who can speak from experience. Reformed offenders can tell young people about how they became involved in crime, the dangers of a criminal lifestyle, and what life in prison is really like. They can also dispel any ideas that teenagers may have about criminals leading glamorous lives. While adolescents are often indifferent to the guidance given by older people, I imagine that most of them would be extremely keen to hear the stories of an ex-offender. The vivid and perhaps shocking nature of these stories is likely to have a powerful impact.

The alternatives to using reformed criminals to educate teenagers about crime would be much less effective. One option would be for police officers to visit schools and talk to young people. This could be useful in terms of informing teens about what happens to lawbreakers when they are caught, but young people are often reluctant to take advice from figures of authority. A second option would be for school teachers to speak to their students about crime, but I doubt that students would see teachers as credible sources of information about this topic. Finally, educational films might be informative, but there would be no opportunity for young people to interact and ask questions.

In conclusion, I fully support the view that people who have turned their lives around after serving a prison sentence could help to deter teenagers from committing crimes.

Essays 12: 政府投资与交通

Governments should spend money on railways rather than roads.

To what extent do you agree or disagree with this statement?

Some people would like governments to invest in rail networks instead of improving road infrastructures. I completely disagree with this idea, for a variety of reasons.

In my opinion, roads are the most important part of a country's transport system, and continual investment is required to maintain and update them. Roads should be prioritised because they are used by every individual citizen in any given country. We all live on or near a street, and our daily movements rely on our road networks being extensive and in good condition. Furthermore, streets and highways serve not only drivers of private cars, but also buses, taxis, cyclists, and a whole range of delivery services for shops and businesses. Without sufficient funding, roads would quickly fall into disrepair, and society as we know it would grind to a halt.

I would also argue that increased government spending on railways is a bad idea at this point in history. One reason why I take this view is the trend towards remote working, which is likely to reduce the pressure on rail networks as commuter numbers fall. I personally travel far less by train these days because I can work from home, and many people are in a similar position. A second reason for my opinion is the coming era of self-driving cars, which are predicted to revolutionise road transport. I believe that people will increasingly choose to travel in driverless taxis rather than on busy public trains.

In conclusion, it seems to me that increased spending on railways is unnecessary, and that roads should be prioritised by governments for future investment.

Essays 13: 老龄化社会与家庭责任

If old people are no longer physically, mentally or financially able to look after themselves, younger family members should be legally responsible for supporting them.

To what extent do you agree or disagree?

Some people argue that we should be legally compelled to take care of our elderly relatives if they become unable to support themselves. I completely disagree with this assertion, for two main reasons.

First and foremost, I find the expectation that family members should always look after ageing relatives totally unrealistic. Most working-age adults lead busy lives, juggling work responsibilities with bringing up children, and they simply do not have the time to care for an elderly person. In many cases they also lack the ability to provide the type of care that is required. For example, my own grandmother's dementia meant that she needed to be looked after in a residential home where a nurse was available at any time of day or night. It would be too expensive for the average family to provide this kind of service at home.

My second argument is that it is simply not necessary to impose a legal obligation of elderly care on families. Many people look after family members voluntarily without any form of official interference. They do so out of love and respect, but also, importantly, because they have the means and ability to offer such care. Currently, in the UK at least, we are free to make our own decisions about elderly care, and this system works perfectly well. Legal obligations would therefore do nothing to help families, and would only burden them with extra stress and worry.

In conclusion, I consider the idea that people could be forced to look after ageing family members to be unreasonable and needless.

Essays 14: 全球化与文化融合

People visiting other countries should adapt to the customs and behaviours expected there. They should not expect the host country to welcome different customs and behaviours. To what extent do you agree or disagree?

To a certain extent I agree that visitors to other countries should respect the culture of the host country. However, I also think that host countries should accept visitors' cultural differences.

In my opinion, people should certainly make an effort to fit in when they travel abroad. By respecting the customs and behaviours of the destination country, travellers can first and foremost avoid offending local people. For example, visitors to England should be aware that direct demands, such as "Give me the bill", come across as rude, and that polite requests are preferred. At the same time, I believe that foreign travel is far more enjoyable when we immerse ourselves in a new culture. I remember my first holiday in France as a child, and how much fun I had experiencing the French way of life, eating the local food, and trying my best to speak in French rather than expecting the locals to understand English.

On the other hand, I do not see why host countries cannot also welcome the different customs and behaviours of foreign visitors. It is unreasonable to expect travellers from a wide variety of diverse backgrounds to assimilate completely and effortlessly into the host culture. Attitudes, traditions and cultural conventions are learned and ingrained over many years, and they can be extremely difficult to change. Furthermore, I believe that local people can celebrate cultural variety rather than discourage it. For example, many people would say that openness to cultural differences is what makes global cities like London and New York so vibrant and prosperous.

In conclusion, I take a balanced view on this issue because I believe that consideration for different customs and behaviours should be expected of tourists and local residents alike.

Essays 15: 现代生活与全球化

Some people believe that nowadays we have too many choices.

To what extent do you agree or disagree with this statement?

It is often said that modern life presents us with an overwhelming number of choices.

I completely agree with this, and I believe that the Internet and globalisation are the two major factors involved.

It is undeniable that the Internet has led to a dramatic expansion in the number of choices that are available to us. The number of online media options, for instance, is now almost endless. There are countless websites offering entertainment, news, videos, on-demand TV and music streaming, many of which are free. I would argue that this abundance of media leads to confusion on the part of the average user, as we have to make so many decisions about the content that we consume. A personal example of this trend would be the fact that I had a choice of just four TV channels when I was a child, whereas I now have access to thousands of films and series through services like Netflix.

Alongside the influence of the Internet, globalisation is making the world smaller and compounding this problem of too much choice. Cheap international flights have made overseas travel possible for millions of people, but this also means that we are faced with a world of options when deciding where to go on holiday or even where to live. We no longer have the limited but simple travel choices of our grandparents' generation. The same is true if we look at the increasing tendency for young people to study abroad. While the opportunity for overseas study seems appealing, many students are confused about where to go and which path to take.

In conclusion, we are faced with a huge number of options in most areas of life nowadays, and this is often more bewildering than beneficial.

Essays 16: 环境保护与气候变化

Some people think that instead of preventing climate change, we need to find a way to live with it.

To what extent do you agree or disagree with this view?

Climate change represents a major threat to life on Earth, but some people argue that we need to accept it rather than try to stop it. I completely disagree with this opinion, because I believe that we still have time to tackle this issue and reduce the human impact on the Earth's climate.

There are various measures that governments and individuals could take to prevent, or at least mitigate, climate change. Governments could introduce laws to limit the carbon dioxide emissions that lead to global warming. They could impose "green taxes" on drivers, airline companies and other polluters, and they could invest in renewable energy production from solar, wind or water power. As individuals, we should also try to limit our contribution to climate change, by becoming more energy efficient, by flying less, and by using bicycles and public transport. Furthermore, the public can affect the actions of governments by voting for politicians who propose to tackle climate change, rather than for those who would prefer to ignore it.

If, instead of taking the above measures, we simply try to live with climate change, I believe that the consequences will be disastrous. To give just one example, I am not optimistic that we would be able to cope with even a small rise in sea levels. Millions of people would be displaced by flooding, particularly in countries that do not have the means to safeguard low-lying areas. These people would lose their homes and their jobs, and they would be forced to migrate to nearby cities or perhaps to other countries. The potential for human suffering would be huge, and it is likely that we would see outbreaks of disease and famine, as well as increased homelessness and poverty.

In conclusion, it is clear to me that we must address the problem of climate change, and I disagree with those who argue that we can find ways to live with it.

Essays 17: 大众媒体与偶像影响

Nowadays celebrities are more famous for their glamour and wealth than for their achievements, and this sets a bad example to young people.
To what extent do you agree or disagree with this statement?

It is true that some celebrities are known for their glamorous lifestyles rather than for the work they do. While I agree that these celebrities set a bad example for children, I believe that other famous people act as positive role models.

On the one hand, many people do achieve fame without really working for it. They may have inherited money from parents, married a famous or wealthy person, or they may have appeared in gossip magazines or on a reality TV programme. A good example would be Paris Hilton, who is rich and famous for the wrong reasons. She spends her time attending parties and nightclubs, and her behaviour promotes the idea that appearance, glamour and media profile are more important than hard work and good character. The message to young people is that success can be achieved easily, and that school work is not necessary.

On the other hand, there are at least as many celebrities whose accomplishments make them excellent role models for young people. Actors, musicians and sports stars become famous idols because they have worked hard and applied themselves to develop real skills and abilities. They demonstrate great effort, determination and ambition, which is required for someone who wants to be truly successful in their chosen field. An example is the actor and martial artist Jackie Chan, who has become world famous through years of practice and hard work. This kind of self-made celebrity can inspire children to develop their talents through application and perseverance.

In conclusion, it seems to me that the influence of celebrities on young people can be positive as well as negative.

Essays 18: 教育与青年发展

Some students choose to work or travel during a 'gap year' after leaving school and before going to university. It is more useful for these young people to work rather than travel during this period of their lives.
To what extent do you agree or disagree with this statement?

It is common in some countries for school leavers to work or travel abroad for a year before beginning their higher education courses. While I agree that gaining work experience may often be the most useful way to spend this gap year, travel may be equally or even more beneficial in some circumstances.

On the one hand, a year in the workplace can be the best decision for many students taking a year off before university. If a young person manages to find employment in their chosen field _of study, this could provide practical, real-world experience of the profession. For example, a prospective law student who does an internship in a legal firm will have the opportunity to follow and be involved in real legal cases. This type of training is likely to give the intern a huge advantage when he or she begins a law degree. Furthermore, upon graduation, the year of legal practice could be a 'foot in the door' for a future job.

On the other hand, not all work placements are useful, and a year of travel may, in some cases, be a better option. Firstly, many young people need a break after years of schooling before they embark on more hard study at university. A year abroad can help to broaden their horizons and give them a new sense of independence and maturity. Secondly, the gap-year traveller may benefit from the chance to practise a foreign language. For example, a Chinese student who has spent a year in Australia will start university with a much better level of English than most of his or her classmates

In conclusion, both work placements and time spent travelling can be equally useful ways to spend a gap year, in my opinion.

Essays 19: 野生动物保护与生态环境

It is a natural process for animal species to become extinct, so there is no reason why people should try to prevent this from happening.

To what extent do you agree or disagree with this statement?

It is true that the extinction of animals happens naturally, and I agree that humans should not try to stop this. However, when human activity puts animal species at risk of disappearing, I completely disagree with the idea that we should do nothing.

On the one hand, I believe that we should not interrupt the natural process of species dying out. Extinction has always been part of the process known as natural selection, which means that stronger or better-adapted animal species survive and breed, whereas weaker species die out. It would be wrong and possibly detrimental to go against this law of nature. If we did attempt to intervene, it would no doubt be extremely costly and probably ineffective. The funding that governments would spend should instead be used to pay for vital resources that humans in many poorer parts of the world desperately need.

On the other hand, we should certainly try to prevent the extinction of animals when it is the result of our own destructive behaviours. In today's world, many wildlife habitats are being destroyed as we cut down forests to make space for farmland, housing and industry. Animals that were previously thriving are at risk only because we have damaged the environment. In these cases, governments and individuals should make every effort to protect endangered species and prevent extinction. For example, pandas in China are bred in captivity and later reintroduced to protected nature reserves, and this scheme is successfully keeping the species safe.

In conclusion, while I support the idea that we should not prevent the natural disappearance of species, I take the opposite view when humans are to blame.

Essays 20: 科学与技术哲学

The most important aim of science should be to improve people's lives.

To what extent do you agree or disagree with this statement?

Many people would argue that scientific research should serve first and foremost to make our lives better. I disagree with this assertion because I believe that science should be free from value judgements, and that it should seek only to advance knowledge.

In my opinion, scientists should not be burdened with the responsibility of deciding what may or may not improve people's lives. A single scientific discovery can have multiple applications in the present and unforeseeable consequences in the future. For example, it is unlikely that the chemists who first investigated nuclear fusion could have predicted nuclear power stations and nuclear weapons. To further complicate this matter, scientific discoveries are never made in isolation; they build on previous knowledge and they lead to new possibilities. Science develops as a whole, and we cannot break it into individual parts that we rank according to utility.

The only aim of science, I believe, should be to further human understanding about any and every aspect of our existence. The scientific method is about developing and testing a theory or hypothesis, with the objective of learning something new. From this perspective, research into new medicines is no more valid, scientifically, than research into the properties of black holes in outer space. Similarly, theories that are proved wrong are just as important, in the scientific process, as those that break new ground. In other words, all scientific inquiry is useful as long as it adds to the sum of human knowledge.

In conclusion, scientists should aspire only to know more, without any obligation to ensure that their work improves lives.

Discuss both views

Essays 21: 科技类（人工智能与未来社会发展）

Some people believe that developments in the field of artificial intelligence will have a positive impact on our lives in the near future. Others, by contrast, are worried that we are not prepared for a world in which computers are more intelligent than humans.

Discuss both of these views and give your own opinion.

People seem to be either excited or worried about the future impact of artificial intelligence. Personally I can understand the two opposing points of view; I am both fascinated by developments in artificial intelligence and apprehensive about its possible negative effects.

On the one hand, the increasing intelligence of technology should bring some obvious benefits. Machines are clearly able to do many jobs better than humans can, especially in areas that require high levels of accuracy or calculations using large amounts of data. For example, robots are being developed that can carry out surgical procedures with greater precision than a human doctor, and we already have cars that use sensors and cameras to drive themselves. Such technologies can improve safety by reducing the likelihood of human errors. It is easy to imagine how these developments, and many others, will steadily improve our quality of life.

On the other hand, I share the concerns of people who believe that artificial intelligence may harm us if we are not careful. In the short term, it is likely that we will see a rise in unemployment as workers in various industries are replaced by machines or software programs. For example, self-driving vehicles are expected to cause redundancies in driving jobs, such as lorry drivers, taxi drivers and bus drivers. In the medium term, if intelligent technologies gradually take jobs away from humans, we may find that people become deskilled and lose their sense of purpose in life. A longer term fear is that computers become so intelligent that they begin to make decisions without human oversight and without regard for our well-being.

In conclusion, while intelligent machines will no doubt improve our lives in many ways, the potential risks of such technologies should not be ignored.

Essays 22: 科技与科学研究类（基因工程、生物技术）

Genetic engineering is an important issue in society today. Some people think that it will improve people's lives in many ways. Others feel that it may be a threat to life on earth .

Discuss both these views and give your own opinion.

It is true that genetic engineering is a key area of modern scientific research, with broad implications for all human societies. While I accept that this field of technology may have its dangers, I believe that the benefits of genetic engineering outweigh the drawbacks.

The negative implications of genetic engineering are often discussed in terms of two key areas, which are food production and the cloning of humans. Genetically modified crops are already being grown, and people are concerned that they may damage whole ecosystems as foods become resistant to diseases and natural predators. For example, scientists are able to produce a variety of corn that releases a toxin to kill certain insects, but this intervention could lead to the disappearance of birds that feed on those insects. In the human realm, some people imagine a world in which clones are used to fight wars or to provide body part replacements. Perhaps cloning could even be used to bring deceased people back to life, which would certainly be a threat to humanity as we know it.

A more optimistic prediction, and one that I favour, is that humans will find ways to mitigate the risks and use genetic technologies in a responsible way. From the food production perspective, genetic engineering could be the solution to famine in developing countries, if, for instance, crops can be grown more reliably in harsh conditions. From a medical perspective, scientists may use genetic engineering to produce vaccines, to cure diseases, or to correct a genetic defect before a child is born. If properly regulated, even cloning can be done in a way that improves lives. For example, the cloning of individual organs, such as a heart or kidney, could be permitted for transplant purposes.

In conclusion, I am convinced that genetic engineering will have a positive impact on our lives, and that people's fears will be unwarranted.

Essays 23: 社会与家庭教育类（儿童独立性与育儿风格）

Some people believe that allowing children to make their own choices on everyday matters (such as food, clothes and entertainment) is likely to result in a society of individuals who only think about their own wishes. Other people believe that it is important for children to make decisions about matters that affect them.

Discuss both these views and give your own opinion.

People have different views about whether or not children should be allowed to make decisions for themselves. While I agree that permissive parenting can create self-centred children, I also believe that there are some potential benefits to giving children more independence when it comes to choice making.

On the one hand, it is easy to imagine that too much freedom of choice in childhood could lead to people becoming selfish as adults. Children who are allowed to eat, wear or do whatever they want tend to be unaccustomed to making compromises or taking the wishes of others into account. They may carry this self-centred attitude into adulthood, and the prevailing culture of a whole society could become more individualistic and mean-spirited. For example, I have a friend whose parents were extremely lenient and let him make decisions about everything from what food he ate to what time he went to bed. Now, as an adult, he struggles to cooperate with others in both social and work settings.

On the other hand, parents can help their children to become independent but considerate adults by allowing them to make certain decisions. Many parents involve their children in decision-making as a way to prepare them for adult life, when they will need to live alone and fend for themselves. For example, parents may take their children food shopping and encourage them to choose ingredients for a meal that they will help to cook for the family. This kind of freedom can also teach children to consider others, such as siblings and friends, instead of thinking about their own selfish interests. For instance, children who are included in discussions about what activities to do at the weekend can learn to express their views but also listen to the opinions of others.

In conclusion, the parenting style that empowers children to make their own choices may make some children selfish, but it may help others to become more self-reliant as they grow up.

Essays 24: 自然环境与生活方式类（气候偏好与日常活动）

Some people prefer to live in hot climates, whereas others love the lifestyle in countries with cold climates.

Discuss both views and explain which climate you prefer.

It is true that people have different preferences with regard to climate. I personally like both hot and cold climates, and so I would say that the ideal place to live would have hot summers and cold winters.

Many people love countries where the weather is hot because we associate this type of climate with summer holidays. Holidaymakers like to go to beach resorts where they can sunbathe, swim in the sea or in outdoor pools, and wear summer clothes like shorts and T-shirts. For British people, Spain is a popular destination for this kind of holiday. We love escaping our cool, rainy climate and being able to enjoy some sunshine. In fact, a large proportion of Brits dream of retiring to Spain and spending their old age sitting in the garden or by the pool.

However, a cold, wintry climate can be equally appealing to many of us for several reasons. Firstly, there are some fantastic outdoor sports and activities that can only be enjoyed when it snows. For example, I have tried skiing and snowboarding, and I have also driven a snowmobile, which was a wonderful, unforgettable experience. Secondly, cold weather can be more comfortable than hot weather, in the sense that we can wear the right clothes to stay warm and we do not need to worry about sweating or sunburn. Finally, the Christmas festive season seems much more special when it is cold and snowy outside.

In conclusion, it seems to me that the best climate is one which changes with the seasons and allows us to experience a range of weather conditions.

Essays 25: 文化与语言类（少数民族语言保护与公共财政支出）

Several languages are in danger of extinction because they are spoken by very small numbers of people. Some people say that governments should spend public money on saving these languages, while others believe that would be a waste of money.

Discuss both these views and give your opinion.

It is true that some minority languages may disappear in the near future. Although it can be argued that governments could save money by allowing this to happen, I believe that these languages should be protected and preserved.

There are two main reasons why saving minority languages could be seen as a waste of money. Firstly, if a language is only spoken by a small number of people, expensive education programmes will be needed to make sure that more people learn it, and the state will have to pay for facilities, teachers and marketing. This money might be better spent on other public services. Secondly, it would be much cheaper and more efficient for countries to have just one language. Governments could cut all kinds of costs related to communicating with each minority group.

Despite the above arguments, I believe that governments should try to preserve languages that are less widely spoken. A language is much more than simply a means of communication; it has a vital connection with the cultural identity of the people who speak it. (For example, residents of the Basque Country in northern Spain consider their language to be the foundation of what unites them as a people and makes their region distinct and separate from the rest of Spain.) Therefore, if a language disappears, a whole way of life will disappear with it, and we will lose the rich cultural diversity that makes societies more interesting. By spending money to protect minority languages, governments can also preserve traditions, customs and behaviours that are part of a country's history.

In conclusion, it may save money in the short term if we allow minority languages to disappear, but in the long term this would have an extremely negative impact on our cultural heritage.

Essays 26: 社会与生活方式类 (现代人际关系、社会独立性与依赖性)

Some people think that in the modern world we are more dependent on each other, while others think that people have become more independent.

Discuss both views and give your own opinion.

People have different views about whether we are more or less dependent on others nowadays. In my view, modern life forces us to be more independent than people were in the past.

There are two main reasons why it could be argued that we are more dependent on each other now. Firstly, life is more complex and difficult, especially because the cost of living has increased so dramatically. For example, young adults tend to rely on their parents for help when buying a house; property prices are higher than ever, and without help it would be impossible for many people to pay a deposit and a mortgage. Secondly, people seem to be more ambitious nowadays, and they want a better quality of life for their families. This means that both parents usually need to work full-time, and they depend on support from grandparents and babysitters for child care.

In spite of the valid arguments above, I agree with those who believe that people are more independent these days. In most countries, families are becoming smaller and more dispersed, which means that people cannot count on relatives as much as they used to. We also have more freedom to travel and live far away from our home towns. For example, many students choose to study abroad instead of going to their local universities, and this experience makes them more autonomous and self-reliant as they learn to live alone. Another factor in this growing separateness is technology, which allows us to work alone at home, to access information without having to ask another person, and to use software to complete tasks that would have required expert help in the past.

In conclusion, while there are some reasons to believe that people now depend on each other more, my own view is that we are more independent than ever.

Essays 27: 社会、劳动与全球化类（人才留存、专业技术人才流动、人才流失）

Some people believe that professionals, such as doctors and engineers, should be required to work in the country where they did their training. Others believe they should be free to work in another country if they wish.

Discuss both these views and give your own opinion.

It is sometimes argued that skilled workers who have been trained at significant cost should be barred from working abroad. Although I understand why people might hold this view, I believe that professionals should be free to work wherever they choose.

On the one hand, there are reasonable arguments to support the idea that certain workers should be prohibited from taking their skills abroad. Firstly, professionals such as doctors, engineers and lawyers owe their careers to many years of schooling, university education, and usually some professional training. Thus, we may consider that they should be grateful, show loyalty to their home countries, and repay their debt to society by working where they were educated. Secondly, when skilled workers move abroad, this leads to what is known as a 'brain drain'. When, for example, the best computer programmers from around the world choose to take jobs in Silicon Valley in the US, they inevitably contribute to a decline in the competitiveness of their own countries' technology sectors.

However, in spite of these arguments, I would side with those who do not believe that workers should be tied to the country where they were trained. Any attempt to control their movements would result in many talented people being unable to pursue their dreams, and therefore feeling trapped and frustrated. If, for example, British programmers were prohibited from taking jobs with Google in the US, many young British people might be deterred from studying computer science in their home country in the first place. Governments should accept that the emigration of professionals and a certain amount of 'brain drain' is a normal occurrence. Instead of imposing restrictions, they should seek to improve their countries and make them more attractive to domestic and international workers alike.

In conclusion, I am opposed to the idea that professionals should only work in the countries where they were trained, even though good arguments can be made in favour of this suggestion.

Essays 28: 社会、健康与人口老龄化类（老年人养生、运动与健康生活方式）

Some people believe that old people should take part in sport to stay healthy.

Others think there are better ways for old people to stay healthy.

Discuss both these views and give your own opinion.

Some people argue that doing sport is the key to maintaining good physical health in old age, but others disagree with this view. In my opinion, playing a sport is just one of several ways for elderly people to remain healthy.

On the one hand, I agree that senior citizens should be encouraged to do some form of sport or exercise. From a physical health perspective, low-impact sports like swimming, cycling and yoga can be extremely beneficial because they build strength, flexibility and endurance. An elderly person who practises one of these sports is much more likely to lead an active, healthy life than one who does not. At the same time, sports can be a way for older people to stay mentally healthy and to feel happy and confident socially. For example, my grandmother has been much more active and sociable since she joined a table tennis club for pensioners.

However, I also believe that other factors are equally important for health and well-being as we grow older. In areas of the world with the highest life expectancies, such as parts of Japan and Italy, the traditional diets of fresh meat, fish, fruit and vegetables are considered to be the main reason why people live longer.

Furthermore, those who live the longest tend to feel that their lives have meaning because they are part of close-knit families and communities. They also sleep well, spend time outdoors in the sun, and avoid stressful situations. These people may not need to do sports to remain healthy.

In conclusion, sports can certainly promote longevity, but a variety of other lifestyle choices may be just as effective in this regard.

Essays 29: 社会与人际关系类（交友原则、思想碰撞与社交心理）

Some people think it is better to choose friends who always have the same opinions as them. Other people believe it is good to have friends who sometimes disagree with them. Discuss both these views and give your own opinion.

Many people prefer to make friends with others who are like-minded in their opinions and beliefs. While this is understandable, I believe that disagreements and different points of view can help to strengthen and deepen friendships.

There are two main reasons why people might prefer to spend time with friends who share their views. Firstly, differing opinions about serious topics can create conflict, and most of us would prefer to enjoy our social time rather than risk having arguments. Here in the UK, for example, the Brexit issue was so divisive that many people found it difficult to remain friends with those who held the opposite opinion. Secondly, it is much harder for people to have their beliefs challenged than it is to have them reinforced. An opposing opinion may be perceived as an insult or a threat to our identity, whereas opinions that support our own can make us feel more confident, intelligent and righteous.

In spite of the reasons given above, I would argue that different perspectives help us to become better people and better friends. Disagreements and opposing opinions require us to listen more carefully, think more deeply, and practise virtues such as empathy and tolerance. As individuals, we therefore have the opportunity to grow through the development of greater wisdom and maturity. We also, in turn, build more genuine, open and trusting friendships when we let go of our fear of being wrong. Personally speaking, I would be slightly suspicious of a friend who always agreed with me, and I would much prefer my friends to be honest with me.

In conclusion, I believe that good friends challenge each other's views and hold each other to account, rather than timidly agreeing with each other to avoid conflict.

Essays 30: 教育与核心选修平衡类（大学通才教育与专才教育的博弈）

Some university students want to learn about other subjects in addition to their main subjects. Others believe it is more important to give all their time and attention to studying for a qualification.

Discuss both these views and give your own opinion.

University students have different preferences with regard to the balance of main and optional subjects that they study. While it can be useful to learn about a wider range of topics, I tend to agree with those who believe that it is better for students to concentrate on the core modules of their degree courses.

Some students want learn about subjects that fall outside the focus of their chosen courses. One reason for this preference could be that they do not yet have a clear idea of the field of study or career path that truly interests them. In this situation, it seems logical to keep options open by attending lectures and seminars on a broad range of subjects. Another explanation could be that students are becoming aware that the job market rewards people who have expertise in more than one area. For example, a company might want to hire accounting graduates who have also learnt how to create marketing campaigns or sales pitches.

In spite of the arguments above, I support the view that university students should spend their time studying a core subject. In any given field there is so much to learn, and if we dilute degree courses, we risk producing graduates whom I would describe as generalists rather than experts. For example, the accounting graduates mentioned in the previous paragraph might have studied sales and marketing at the expense of becoming truly proficient accountants. They might attract new clients but then deliver a poor service. By contrast, an undergraduate who opts only to study accounting modules is likely to be a more knowledgeable and effective professional.

In conclusion, although I understand why wide-ranging university courses may seem attractive, I believe that students should aim to become experts in their chosen main subjects.

Advantages and disadvantages

Essays 31: 社会类 / 科技与犯罪类 (利弊分析)

In many cities the use of video cameras in public places is being increased in order to reduce crime, but some people believe that these measures restrict our individual freedom.

Do the advantages of video surveillance outweigh the disadvantages?

It is true that video surveillance has become commonplace in many cities in recent years. While I understand that critics may see this as an invasion of privacy, I believe that the benefits do outweigh the drawbacks.

There are two main reasons why people might disapprove of the use of video cameras in public places. The first objection is that these cameras invade our privacy, in the sense that we are constantly being watched by the authorities or by private security firms. Many people find this intrusive and feel that the recording of their movements is a form of state control that curtails their individual freedom. The second argument against the proliferation of CCTV cameras is that they are being used as an alternative to police officers patrolling the streets. If this is indeed happening, then it is unlikely that members of the public will feel safer.

In spite of the drawbacks mentioned above, I believe that the use of video cameras to monitor public areas is a positive measure. The key objective of video surveillance is to deter criminals and to prevent crime. For example, petty criminals like shoplifters and pickpockets are less likely to operate in parts of cities where they know that they are being watched. At the same time, when crimes are committed, the police can use video evidence to catch and prosecute offenders. Therefore, in my view, video cameras offer valuable support to police officers, and they make cities safer for inhabitants, workers and visitors alike.

In conclusion, it seems to me that we gain more than we lose from the enhanced security that CCTV cameras bring to our cities.

Essays 32: 旅游类 / 环境与经济类 (利弊分析)

International tourism has brought enormous benefit to many places. At the same time, there is concern about its impact on local inhabitants and the environment.

Do the disadvantages of international tourism outweigh the advantages?

It is true that the global tourism industry can have both positive and negative impacts on people and places. However, I would argue that the positives far outweigh the negatives.

On the one hand, international tourism can sometimes be detrimental to local residents and the natural environment in tourist areas. Locals may suffer as prices, for everything from property to goods and services, become hugely inflated. This is certainly the case in popular city destinations like London and Paris, where the high cost of living means that many residents are forced to move out to the suburbs. Wild animals may also be pushed out of their natural habitats by tourism. For example, tourists from across the world visit the Hawaiian Islands to go whale watching, but these boat trips have been linked with a decline in native dolphin populations.

However, I believe that the advantages of global tourism more than compensate for the problems described above. Tourists who are able to afford overseas holidays tend to spend significant amounts of money on goods and services, such as food, accommodation and entertainment. This activity creates employment opportunities for local residents, who are likely to see their quality of life improve rather than decline. With regard to the environment, the revenue from visitors can be used to protect wild animals and areas of natural beauty. This is what happens in countries like Kenya, where the income from safari tourism funds various national parks, nature reserves and a wildlife protection service.

In conclusion, it seems to me that the potential benefits of international tourism are much more significant than the drawbacks.

Essays 33: 科技类 / 交通出行类 (利弊分析)

In the future all cars, buses and trucks will be driverless. The only people travelling inside these vehicles will be passengers.

Do you think the advantages of driverless vehicles outweigh the disadvantages?

Self-driving vehicles are predicted to revolutionise the transport sector in the near future. Although some negative consequences can be expected, I believe that the benefits of driverless vehicles will far exceed the drawbacks.

The shift towards self-driving cars, buses and trucks will inevitably come with certain costs. One obvious downside is that people will most likely lose the right to drive their own cars on public roads, because it will be argued that autonomous vehicles are safer. Many people enjoy the pleasure of driving, and I imagine that they will only be allowed to drive on special private circuits in the future. Perhaps more importantly, the driverless revolution is likely to have all kinds of negative economic repercussions, particularly within the transport sector. For example, millions of taxi and bus drivers will lose their jobs as they are replaced by taxis and buses that drive themselves.

In spite of these disadvantages, there are two significant advantages that make the move to driverless vehicles worthwhile. Firstly, it is predicted that we will see a dramatic fall in the number of road accidents. Computer-driven vehicles will not only obey traffic rules and stick to speed limits; they will also communicate with each other to avoid collisions. Secondly, autonomous vehicles are expected to ease traffic congestion. They will do this by using real-time data to calculate optimal routes, and by utilising sensors that allow them to stay much closer to other vehicles on the road.

In conclusion, I believe that we should embrace our driverless-vehicle future because we will gain much more than we lose.

Essays 34: 政府职能与民生类 / 医疗健康类（利弊分析）

In many countries, medical services are run by profit-making companies, and patients must pay to access healthcare.

Do the advantages of private healthcare outweigh the disadvantages?

It is true that private firms play a significant role in the healthcare provision in many parts of the world. In my opinion, the benefits of private healthcare outweigh the drawbacks.

On the one hand, there are two main disadvantages of private medicine. First, the cost of this type of medical care is expensive, and this means that wealthier people can afford treatment that is not available to people with less money. As a result, a well-off cancer patient, for example, may live longer than a less affluent person who has the same illness. A second drawback is the commercial nature of private healthcare providers. If their priority is to make a profit, doctors in private hospitals and clinics may be incentivised to focus on some medical conditions that bring in more money, or sell certain expensive drugs instead of cheaper alternatives.

However, in spite of these disadvantages, I would argue that private healthcare is beneficial and useful. For people who are happy to pay for medical treatments and private doctors, this option is fast, convenient, effective and more personalised when compared to public healthcare. In my view, paying for medical care is no different from buying more expensive food, clothing or housing, and so I do not see it as unfair. In fact, by choosing to go private, wealthy people may actually help to ease waiting lists in public or state hospitals and clinics. Finally, private practices may have the funds and facilities to pursue medical research that leads to new medicines and treatments, which therefore benefits every member of society.

In conclusion, although there are good arguments against profit-making medical care, I believe that it has its place in the health sector and it does more good than harm.

Problem and solution

Essays 35: 城市化类 / 政府职能类（问题与解决方案分析）

More and more people are migrating to cities in search of a better life, but city life can be extremely difficult.

Explain some of the difficulties of living in a city. How can governments make urban life better for everyone?

Cities are often seen as places of opportunity, but there are also some major drawbacks of living in a large metropolis. In my opinion, governments could do much more to improve city life for the average inhabitant.

The main problem for anyone who hopes to migrate to a large city is that the cost of living is likely to be much higher than it is in a small town or village. Inhabitants of cities have to pay higher prices for housing, transport, and even food. Another issue is that urban areas tend to suffer from social problems such as high crime and poverty rates in comparison with rural areas. Furthermore, the air quality in cities is often poor, due to pollution from traffic, and the streets and public transport systems are usually overcrowded. As a result, city life can be unhealthy and stressful.

However, there are various steps that governments could take to tackle these problems. Firstly, they could invest money in the building of affordable or social housing to reduce the cost of living. Secondly, politicians have the power to ban vehicles from city centres and promote the use of cleaner public transport, which would help to reduce both air pollution and traffic congestion. In London, for example, the introduction of a congestion charge for drivers has helped to curb the traffic problem. A third option would be to develop provincial towns and rural areas, by moving industry and jobs to those regions, in order to reduce the pressure on major cities.

In conclusion, governments could certainly implement a range of measures to enhance the quality of life for all city residents.

Essays 36: 社会人口类 / 政府职能类（问题与解决方案分析）

In the developed world, average life expectancy is increasing.

What problems will this cause for individuals and society? Suggest some measures that could be taken to reduce the impact of ageing populations.

It is true that people in industrialised nations can expect to live longer than ever before. Although there will undoubtedly be some negative consequences of this trend , societies can take steps to mitigate these potential problems.

As people live longer and the populations of developed countries grow older, several related problems can be anticipated. The main issue is that there will obviously be more people of retirement age who will be eligible to receive a pension. The proportion of younger, working adults will be smaller, and governments will therefore receive less money in taxes in relation to the size of the population. In other words, an ageing population will mean a greater tax burden for working adults. Further pressures will include a rise in the demand for healthcare, and the fact young adults will increasingly have to look after their elderly relatives.

There are several actions that governments could take to solve the problems described above. Firstly, a simple solution would be to increase the retirement age for working adults, perhaps from 65 to 70. Nowadays, people of this age tend to be healthy enough to continue a productive working life. A second measure would be for governments to encourage immigration in order to increase the number of working adults who pay taxes. Finally, money from national budgets will need to be taken from other areas and spent on vital healthcare, accommodation and transport facilities for the rising numbers of older citizens.

In conclusion, various measures can be taken to tackle the problems that are certain to arise as the populations of countries grow older.

Essays 37: 社会贫困与民生类 / 农业与经济类（问题与解决方案分析）

In spite of the advances made in agriculture, many people around the world still go hungry.

Why is this the case? What can be done about this problem?

It is true that there are people who go hungry each day across the world, despite the abundance of food that modern farming produces. This essay will discuss the principal cause of this problem and a possible solution to it.

In my opinion, poverty is the main reason why hunger continues to be a global problem. Even in the richest countries, issues like unemployment, debt, illness and mental health problems can push people below the poverty line. As a consequence, they may be unable to buy enough healthy food to feed themselves and their families, and this will lead to undernourishment and hunger. The UK is a good example of a developed country where news broadcasts regularly report cases of people who miss meals because they have no money left towards the end of each month. In fact, it is said that many British children go hungry during school holidays when their parents cannot afford nutritious food and free school meals are not available.

The best solution to the hunger problem is for governments to work on lifting people out of poverty. This can be done through the creation of new jobs to provide employment opportunities for people who are currently without work. By tackling unemployment, governments can help people financially and ensure that they earn enough money to buy the food that they need. In the UK, for example, it has been suggested that the Government could create thousands of jobs by investing in 'green economy' projects, in areas such as clean energy creation and recycling. These initiatives could provide people with good incomes, thereby alleviating the poverty that causes hunger and malnutrition.

In conclusion, the problem of world hunger will not be solved by advances in agriculture, but by raising employment levels to reduce poverty.

Essays 38: 交通运输类 / 城市发展类（问题与解决方案分析）

Traffic congestion is becoming a huge problem for many major cities. Suggest some measures that could be taken to reduce traffic in big cities.

It is true that the traffic problem in large cities is becoming worse by the year. Traffic congestion can be tackled in many ways, but this essay will focus on two of the most important measures that could be taken.

One measure that could be taken to reduce traffic is to improve the public transport infrastructure in cities. As a first step, I believe that buses and train carriages should be replaced every few years so that they are always modern, clean and comfortable. This would make travel by bus and train a much more pleasant experience for commuters, which might persuade them to switch from cars to public transport. In Manchester, for example, many of the trains that bring commuters from the suburbs are old, dull and somewhat dirty. If these trains were replaced by brand new, pristine models, I am convinced that many more workers would forgo their cars and take the train instead.

Another way to address the traffic issue in cities is to introduce a congestion charge. This is a fee that drivers who enter the city centre are obliged to pay, and it can be enforced through the use of cameras that record vehicle registration plates. For example, a congestion charge system was implemented in London several years ago, and motorists are required to pay around £ 15 per day to enter a city centre zone. This type of system reduces traffic by discouraging people from commuting by car, or perhaps by encouraging them to carpool with colleagues. Furthermore, congestion charges raise money for investment into better public transport networks, which can also help to alleviate the traffic problem.

In conclusion, the problem of traffic congestion can be addressed by improving public transportation and by charging drivers who enter city centres.

Essays 39: 社会民生与家庭类 / 人口老龄化类（问题与解决方案分析）

It is difficult for people to care for their elderly family members.

What are the reasons for this, and what solutions can you suggest?

It is certainly true that caring for ageing relatives is extremely challenging. There are several reasons why this is the case, but steps can be taken to make carers' lives easier.

In my opinion, families face two main difficulties when they try to look after their elderly members at home. The first problem is that an adult family member usually needs to be available at all times to help with everything from getting the older person dressed to making meals and administering medicines. This type of daily care can be stressful because it requires so much time and effort, and because it dramatically limits the freedom of the caregiver. A second problem is the financial cost of the dependent person. Families that look after an older relative are likely to spend more money on everything from medicines to food and heating.

In order to address the above problems, I believe that families require different kinds of outside assistance. On the one hand, government healthcare departments should provide practical help in the form of home visits from nurses, and perhaps the option for elderly people to stay in care homes for short periods of time. In this way, families can have some time off, and the burden of elderly care can be lessened. On the other hand. the state can also relieve families of s o m e of the financial strain of looking after an ageing relative. In the UK, for example, family members can apply for a carer's allowance, which is essentially a basic salary for caregivers.

In conclusion, elderly care is never going to be an easy task, but the burden on family members can be reduced with the right help and support.

Positive or negative

Essays 40: 家庭与社会生活类 / 现代生活方式趋势（正负面倾向分析判断）

In many countries today, people in cities either live alone or in small family units, rather than in large, extended family groups.

Is this a positive or negative trend?

It is true that cities are seeing a rise in smaller families and one-person households, while the extended family is becoming a rarity. In my opinion, this is a negative development.

As families become smaller, the traditional family support network is disappearing, and this can have a negative impact on children as they grow up. In a nuclear family or single-parent household, childcare becomes an expensive and stressful part of daily life. Without the help of grandparents or aunts and uncles, busy parents must rely on babysitters, nannies and after-school clubs to take care of younger children, while older children may be left alone after school and during holidays. The absence of adult family members can mean that friends, television and the Internet become the primary influences on children's behaviour. It is no surprise that the decline of the extended family has been linked to a rise in psychological and behavioural problems amongst young people.

The trend towards people living alone is perhaps even more damaging because of the psychological effects of reduced human interaction. Individuals who live on their own have nobody to talk to in person, so they cannot share problems or discuss the highs and lows of daily life. They forgo the constant stimulation and hustle and bustle of a large family, and are left to their own devices for extended periods of time. The lack of human contact in the home is necessarily replaced by passive distractions, such as television, video games, online chat rooms or Internet surfing. This type of existence is associated with boredom, loneliness, and feelings of isolation or even alienation, all of which are factors that are known to increase the risk of mental illness.

In conclusion, I believe that individuals thrive when they are part of larger family groups, and so it is worrying that many people are choosing to live alone or in such small family units.

Essays 41: 教育类 / 科技类 (利弊分析/单边支持型)

Some universities now offer their courses on the Internet so that people can study online.

Is this a positive or negative development?

It is true that online courses are becoming a common feature of university education. Although there are some drawbacks of Internet-based learning, I would argue that there are far more benefits.

The main drawback of the trend towards online university courses is that there is less direct interaction. Students may not have the opportunity to engage face-to-face with their teachers, and will instead have to rely on written forms of communication. Similarly, students who study online do not come into direct contact with each other, and this could have a negative impact on peer support, discussion and exchange of ideas. For example, whereas students on traditional courses can attend seminars and even discuss their subjects over coffee after lessons, online learners are restricted to chatting through website forum areas. These learners may also lack the motivation and element of competition that face-to-face group work brings.

Despite the negatives mentioned above, I believe that online university courses are a positive development for various reasons. Firstly, they allow learners to study in a flexible way, meaning that they can work whenever and wherever is convenient, and they can cover the material at their own pace. Secondly, the cost of a university education can be greatly reduced, while revenues for institutions may increase as more students can be taught. Finally, online learning offers open access to anybody who is willing to study, regardless of age, location, ability and background. For example, my uncle, who is 65 years old, has recently enrolled on an online MBA course in a different country, which would have been impossible in the days before Internet-based education.

In conclusion, while I recognise the possible disadvantages of online learning, I consider it to be a positive development overall.

Essays 42: 全球化类 / 文化类 (利弊分析)

Countries are becoming more and more similar because people are able to buy the same products anywhere in the world.

Do you think this is a positive or negative development?

It is true that countries are becoming increasingly alike in terms of the goods that people can purchase. Although there are some drawbacks of this trend, I believe that there are more benefits.

On the one hand, as countries become more similar, they lose their individual identities. For instance, people all over the world now wear the same styles and brands of clothing that they buy from stores which can be found in most major cities. A good example of this is the fact that so many people across the globe wear jeans, by brands like Calvin Klein, which originally come from the USA. This means that fewer people wear the traditional clothing of their own countries, such as the Chi-pao in China. It is a pity to lose cultural differences in the way people dress because they make the world more interesting.

However, I believe that the advantages of globalisation outweigh this disadvantage. One benefit for individual people is that travel is becoming much easier as companies go multinational and the differences between countries disappear. A person who travels abroad will recognise global product brands, such as Uniqlo or Hugo Boss and this familiarity may help him or her to feel more at ease in the new environment. Taking a broader view, the global market for goods is beneficial for both national economies and international relations between countries. As countries trade with each other and become more similar, we could see greater political stability and fewer conflicts.

In conclusion, despite the fact that countries are losing their own identities, I believe that the trend towards cultural similarity is having a positive impact on our lives.

Two-part questions

Essays 43: 社会类 / 职场教育类（双部分回答型）

In education and employment, some people work harder than others.

Why do some people work harder? Is it always a good thing to work hard?

It is true that some people are hard-working and diligent while others prefer not to push themselves, and there could be various reasons for these different attitudes. In my view, a positive work ethic is desirable up to a point, but too much hard work can be counterproductive and even unhealthy.

In my experience, there are three main factors that influence how hard people study or work. One key factor that drives people and makes them more studious and goal-oriented is parental pressure. Some medical students, for example, are motivated to study hard because they do not wish to disappoint family members who expect them to graduate successfully and become doctors. On the other hand, there are people who see hard work as a means to escape poverty or create a completely new life for themselves. Finally, it seems to me that some people are more driven and persistent as students or workers simply because they have found a subject or job that they truly enjoy; people who love their work describe it as effortless rather than hard.

When a person is described as hard-working, this is almost always seen as a positive trait or attitude. In the realm of education, we expect hard workers to diligently follow instructions, pass their exams, achieve good grades and take their first steps on the path to a successful career. Similarly, in an employment setting, we expect the most motivated, industrious and committed individuals to rise to the top and become leaders or experts in their fields. However, I believe that in some people the desire to work hard can become an unhealthy obsession with perfection, outcompeting others or being the best. When people work so hard that they neglect family and relationships or become stressed and irritable, a positive trait has surely become detrimental.

In conclusion, there are a range of motivations that may explain a person's work ethic, and I believe that industriousness is usually, but not always, a good thing.

Essays 44: 政府政策类 / 社会发展类（双部分回答型）

Economic progress is often used to measure a country's success. However, some people believe that other factors are more important.

What other factors should also be considered when measuring a country's success? Do you think one factor is more important than others?

The relative success of different countries is usually defined in economic terms. There are several other factors, apart from the economy, that could be used to assess a country, and in my opinion education is the most important of all.

Standards of education, health and individual human rights should certainly be considered when measuring a country's status. A good education system is vital for the development of any nation, with schools, colleges and universities bearing the responsibility for the quality of future generations of workers. Healthcare provision is also an indicator of the standard of living within a country, and this can be measured by looking at average life expectancy rates or availability of medical services. Furthermore, human rights and levels of equality could be taken into account. For example, a country in which women do not have the same opportunities as men might be considered less successful than a country with better gender equality.

In my view, a country's education system should be seen as the most important indicator of its success and level of development. This is because education has a considerable effect on the other factors mentioned above. It affects people's health in the sense that doctors and nurses need to be trained and scientists need to be educated to the highest levels before they can carry out medical research. It also affects the economy in the sense that a well-educated workforce will allow a variety of companies and industries to flourish, leading to trade with other countries, and increased wealth. Finally, educated citizens are more likely to be tolerant, open-minded supporters of equality and improved human rights.

In conclusion, nations can be assessed and compared in a variety of ways, but I would argue that the standard of a country's education system is the best measure of its success.

Essays 45: 文化历史类 / 社会生活类（双部分回答型）

In some countries, more and more people are becoming interested in finding out about the history of the house or building they live in.

What are the reasons for this? How can people research this?

It is becoming increasingly common for people to want to learn more about their homes' past. I believe that there are two main reasons for this trend, and there are a variety of ways for people to shed light on the history of a house or building.

In my opinion, there are two main reasons why people research the history of their homes. Firstly, many homeowners are simply curious about when and why their houses were built, who lived in them previously, and how they have changed over the years. Knowing such details can help people to feel a deeper connection to a property and its past. Secondly, it has become popular for people to think about their homes' histories for design and renovation purposes. Here in the UK, for example, many people live in Victorian era houses and wish to know whether features such as fireplaces or ceiling cornices are original.

Information about the history of a property can be gathered in various ways. An obvious approach is to question the previous owners or speak to neighbours. For example, my elderly neighbours told me that the overgrown path next to my house belonged to a local church, and they remembered the vicar walking along it every Sunday morning. As well as asking local people, we can also consult official sources, such as solicitors or the land registry office, when researching a property. A third possibility would be to search online, or perhaps in a local library, for historical records about the building, the street address, or the wider local area.

In conclusion, people may look into the history of their homes out of curiosity or for refurbishment reasons, and there are a range of research routes that they can take.

Essays 46: 社会生活类 / 住房类（双部分回答型）

In some countries, owning a home rather than renting one is very important for people. Why might this be the case? Do you think this is a positive or negative situation?

It is true that many people prefer to buy their own homes, instead of paying rent as a tenant. There are several reasons why people make this choice, and I believe that the desire to own a home is something positive.

In my opinion, there are two main reasons why someone may want to own rather than rent a house. The first reason is the security that home ownership gives people. Whereas renters are at the mercy of landlords who can evict tenants at short notice, owners have no such worries, and may feel a greater sense of long-term stability. Another good reason to buy instead of an asset and an investment. My own house, for example, has risen in value since I bought it, and I have paid off a proportion of my mortgage, which means that I could potentially sell the house and make money or move up the property ladder.

I would argue that the preference for buying a home can be seen as positive from both a personal and an economic perspective. From a personal point of view, owning a home is aspirational, and owner-occupiers are more likely to take pride in their properties and keep them in better condition than renters would. For example, many British home owners spend huge amounts of time planting flowers, mowing lawns and sculpting hedges to make their front gardens look pleasant, but few renters do this. Home ownership is also positive from an economic perspective because it motivates people to work hard to pay off their mortgages and own their homes outright before retirement. A workforce of motivated, industrious and diligent people is clearly beneficial for both companies and the economy as a whole.

In conclusion, I fully understand people's desire to own their own homes, and I see this as a positive aspiration.

Essays 47: 社会职场类 (双部分回答型)

Nowadays many people choose to be self-employed, rather than to work for a company or organisation.

Why might this be the case? What could be the disadvantages of being self-employed?

It is true that increasing numbers of people are deciding to work for themselves instead of as employees. There are various positive reasons for this trend, but we should also recognise that self-employment has its drawbacks.

In my opinion, there are two main benefits that make being self-employed attractive. First, people who choose this career path often do so because they desire freedom, which could mean the flexibility to work when and where they want or the ability to make their own rules. Being their own bosses may also give people the freedom to be creative, or to be more selective in choosing work that they find deeply fulfilling. The second key attraction of self-employment is that it may lead to opportunities for business growth and greater success. Many of us want to emulate famous entrepreneurs, like Richard Branson of the company Virgin', who started with nothing and built great companies and fortunes.

However, working for oneself has two significant disadvantages, namely responsibility and risk. With regard to responsibilities, self-employed workers have to worry about everything from sales and marketing to accounting and taxes. This can lead to overwork and high levels of stress, and it becomes difficult for many entrepreneurs to switch off and spend time relaxing or with family. The other main downside to going it alone is the risk of failure, with a large proportion of small businesses going bankrupt in their first few years. For example, a friend of mine became self-employed as a surveyor, but he was forced to close down his business when an important client failed to make a large payment.

In conclusion, self-employment is an attractive choice for many people, but it comes with some considerable risks.

Essays 48: 历史与社会类（双部分回答型）

Some people say that now is the best time in history to be alive.

What is your opinion about this? What other time in history would be interesting to live in?

It is often said that we are lucky to be living in the best period in human history. I disagree with this view, and I believe that the late twentieth century was a better era than the current one.

In my opinion, this is not the best time in history because modern life has become too stressful. Perhaps the main cause of stress is the cost of living, which is far higher than it was even two decades ago. House prices, for example, have soared in recent years, meaning that many young adults struggle to get on the property ladder and are forced to continue living with their parents. Another key stressor in today's world is the Internet, and social media in particular. Platforms like Instagram display the seemingly perfect lifestyles of famous 'influencers', and it is common for young people to experience feelings of inadequacy and unhappiness as their own lives seem far less appealing.

I would argue that life was better in the second half of the twentieth century. It must have been fascinating and exciting to witness the cultural changes of the 1960s and 1970s. In the UK, for example, the 1960s saw a revolution in music, with bands like The Beatles and The Rolling Stones inspiring a generation of teenagers. Young people at that time felt liberated and full of hope for the future, rather than anxious and angry as many of them do now. They believed that wars would end, everyone would have a job, and technology would improve every aspect of our lives.

In conclusion, it seems to me that many of us are dissatisfied with the modern world, and that the final decades of the last century were both happier and more interesting.

Essays 49: 文化艺术类（双部分回答型/多维度阐述）

Music and other arts seem to be features of every society. In what ways are music and other arts important for societies and for individuals?

It is true that art forms, from music to sculpture, are present in all human cultures. In my opinion, there are two main reasons why the arts are essential for societies and individual people, and these will be explained below.

Perhaps the most basic and essential role of the arts is to entertain people. Humans enjoy music, literature, dance, theatre and other art forms because they provoke powerful emotions, such as joy and empathy, and because they connect us through shared experiences. For example, when I listen to a guitarist like John Williams, my spirits are lifted, and I am amazed by the beautiful musicianship. Other people prefer live music, theatre and art events, where they can enjoy artistic performances together, and which encourage the release of emotion through dance, applause, cheering and laughter. In my opinion, the arts are the highest form of entertainment, offering much more than the simple pleasures of sports and games.

The second key reason why the arts are so important is their contribution to cultural identities. All artistic works are created by humans living in specific eras and within particular socio-cultural contexts. Impressionist painting, for example, is associated with 19th-century French artists, while blues music originated in African-American communities in the United States at roughly the same time. Both art forms have become part of the global image of their respective nations, and are a source of pride and national identity for many French and American citizens. In a similar way, music, works of art and literature are part of the history and heritage of all countries, providing a cultural foundation that binds individuals to each other and to their ancestors.

In conclusion, I believe that the arts are an indispensable source of entertainment and identity for all people and societies.

Essays 50: 广告与媒体类 / 消费主义社会类（双部分回答型）

In their advertising, businesses nowadays usually emphasise that their products are new in some way.

Why is this? Do you think it is a positive or negative development?

It is true that companies like to promote their products as being new, modern or state-of-the-art. There are two main reasons why businesses do this, and I see the focus on 'new' as an unfortunate reflection of modern society's materialism.

Advertisers use the appeal of novelty in order to compete in the marketplace, and because they understand consumer psychology. In simple terms, companies produce and sell new products in an attempt to set themselves apart from their competitors. When, for example, Apple created the first iPhone, their advertisements emphasised the keyless glass screen because no other phone on the market had this feature. New products and features are sold with the promise that they will save time, improve the user's experience, increase the owner's status, or enhance the customer's quality of life in some way. Advertisers have learnt that such promises are incredibly effective sales tools because they tap into our deepest desires as humans.

In my opinion, this endless marketing of new consumer goods is a negative development. Advertisements no longer inform us about a product's quality because the only goal is to persuade us to buy the latest, shiniest item. We are being trained to become better, more materialistic consumers, who are happy to throw relatively new items away and purchase things that we do not truly need. This is why many of us replace our mobile phones with the latest model, even when our old phones still work, and why so much clothing is discarded every year as people rush to keep up with new fashions. Ultimately, we are stuck in a model of production and advertising that manipulates the public, harms the environment, and primarily benefits the largest corporations.

In conclusion, the advertising of new products drives competition and consumer behaviour, but it is responsible for the creation of our materialistic, throwaway culture.
